twice a year. "A lot of people jumped on that look, Dolce & Gabbana, Michael Kors. It's a comfortable shoe that's cute with jeans in the summer. They're fashionable ones," she says. "Granda glams."

And of course she's still an in-demand supermodel, wading through Victoria's Secret and wearing eye-lids but body paint for this year's Sports Illustrated swimsuit issue.

Yet, during our conversation it becomes clear that Kham still manages to spend more time with her kids than some average working-class parents. Despite all the trips to exotic locales, this mom-and-a-half-day trip to New York marks only the second time she's travelled without her kids since Lani was born two years ago. "There have only been six days out of two years that I've been away from her," notes Kham.

"THEY HAVE A SAYING IN ARABIC: WITH THE CHILD COMES GOOD FORTUNE. YOU HAVE A KID, AND EVERYTHING ELSE COMES WITH IT."

Not that Kham thinks she's doing anything special. "It's a job. Everybody has a job. Other people work hard and come home at the end of the day. Businessmen go on business trips, women work in offices. I actually have more freedom, I can say, 'Hey, I'm going to Mexico for the week.' People who work in offices don't have it that easy."

When she shot Top Model in Germany for six weeks last year, her family took over the top floor of a hotel, filled it with enough playthings to rival Toys "R" Us and nicknamed "the whole German mafia" of relatives, she says—from grandparents to aunts and uncles—for big family dinners.

"When I shoot in Mexico, the family will come, and we'll stay for an extra few days. You can do it, but you plan it," she says. "I've been on a BlackBerry from the moment it came out."

She also works around Seal's tour schedule, since he enjoys taking the kids along with him whenever possible. (It's not unusual for Seal to do a sound check with Lani or Henry in his arms.) They've even snuggled his tour bus with bedded down baby beds.

"They're quite the little geniuses," Heidi says of Lani and Henry. Of course, she provides plenty of entertain ment—from favourite German children's books to Baby Einstein DVDs for Lani to watch on her own sticker-covered laptop. "It's not like when people without kids."
